LIV-A SLIGHT MISCONCEPTION.

Allison found a hearty welcome at the Springs.

In answer to her telegram, Mrs. Atherton was at the station to meet her.

"My dearest child!" she cried, folding her slim daughter in her arms. "How I've longed to see you! Let me look at you."

She held the girl off at arm's length and scrutinized her closely. "Umm! A little paler than usual, Allison, you don't look happy. Has that wretched boy—"

"Oh, no, nothing is wrong, mother. We haven't quarreled," Allison assured her glibly. "I just got lonely for my mother—and here I am," she laughed, squeezing the arm within her caught a glimpse of Mrs. Atherton's platform and had perceived the flood of wonderful light that lit the mother's eyes as she descended from the car, Allison had seen, realized how sorely she had missed her daily companionship.

"I'm so glad to be with you again," she laughed gaily. "Oh, how I miss you! And you're looking splendidly! Cousin Barbara hasn't worried you a bit, judging from your appearance. Where is she, by the way?"

"Waiting for you at the hotel," she wouldn't let it be for the world, but she was delighted when your wife arrived saying you were coming. She wore a new frock and ordered tea in her sitting room. But she didn't notice it, and don't mind if she says horrid things about Lawrence. She doesn't mean a word of it."

"What a conspiracy!" laughed Allison. "I feel as though I were living in a world of intrigue these days. I wonder where anyone ever got the idea that marriage was a nice, comfortable, pinushiony existence."

"Why do you say that?" questioned her mother apprehensively. "They were strolling up the broad, shrub-bordered path that led to the hotel. Allison flicked at a clover blossom with her sunshade before answering.

Fashionable Nancy

"This time," said Nancy, "you may be sure to turn one's mind to the tailleur."

A thing that's made right to the letter.

And so she hastened out to get her Fall model, it's the tricotline in which Miss Nancy now is seen.

Hard Work Ahead to Register New Voters and Get Them to Polls.

By CONSTANCE DREXEL.
(Public Ledger Service.)

Patented and satisfied! There was a sigh of relief all over the country last week that the question which has been occupying so much public attention these last few months had at last been settled. Now the States which are affected by the Federal suffrage amendment are busy settling the necessary machinery in motion to take care of the new women voters. Owing to the shortness of time between now and the elections, much work will have to be done to properly assess and register the women who will take advantage of their newly acquired franchise.

Had the thirty-six State legislatures ratified last spring, as women suffrage leaders had been led to expect, the new League of Women Voters would have been spending these months in getting out the women. It is readily acknowledged that a lot of education and persuasion will be necessary to get the women out. Though this long suffrage campaign has been going on for some time, it is still in its infancy. The women who are now being registered are the women who will take advantage of their newly acquired franchise.

There's Barbara! called Allison, brandishing her sunshade. "Here's the baby turned up again!" "Miss Wiles came up to them," still unsmiling, she extended a cold check for the girl's car.

"I'm glad to see that you've come to your senses and left that young hound," she remarked with tight lips.

Allison, aghast at the misconception, cast a swift look over Miss Wiles' shoulder at her mother, who, flushing, placed a finger to her lips.
